The Science of Numismatics

The Mercantile Money Museum is a cooperative undertaking of Mercantile Bank and the Eric P. Newman Numismatic Education Society. In addition to many changing exhibits, the museum features two audiovisual mannequins—Benjamin Franklin and a counterfeiter. Franklin expounds on money matters and the world scene, peppering his remarks with his many witticisms. The counterfeiter, in prison garb, ruefully explains his predicament and the penalties for counterfeiting. A charming Victorian library houses the Newman collection of numismatic literature and is available by appointment to students and scholars.

"Numismatics" is derived from the Greek word "nomisma" meaning customary currency. The interest in collecting old coins first attained popularity during the Italian Renaissance of the fourteenth century. Noblemen of the era established vast collections of ancient Greek and Roman coins. Not until the seventeenth century did numismatics attract the interest of scholars who began the classification of coins and the reconstruction of events surrounding their minting, issuance and use.
